Foster Parent Showcase: Meet the Goble-Recker Family

Laura Goble and Rich Recker moved to this area from Oregon in 2012 and have been foster parents with the agency for three years; however, the idea of foster parenting was not new to them, they were foster parents in Oregon as well. They have always been strong advocates for children and were considering going through the certification process here when the opportunity to be kinship caregivers for two young children arose. Once the kids were placed with them, they signed up for the first foster parent training series that was available—and here they are three years later!

Caring for and supporting kids has been a shared value for Laura and Rich so foster parenting just seemed like a natural fit and something they could not avoid. They knew they wanted to be parents at some point and their family experience showed them that there are MANY children who need love and to experience "family" without creating new babies. For them, it's about "helping kids see the potential they have and to be a better version of themselves, and watching as they take a courageous step, no matter how big or small, toward being the person they want to become."

While fostering children is rewarding, it has not come without it's challenges. Rich says that "no matter how well prepared you think you are, you are never completely ready.

Being humble enough to know you still have much to learn—and being open to it—is important to parenting and finding joy in it." All children in foster care have been exposed to some form of trauma. The very act of being put in foster care is traumatic for children, because it means the loss of their birth family and often friends, schoolmates, teachers, and everything that is familiar. "Caring for kids who have experienced trauma will constantly test you and add stress to your relationship. It can, as we've learned, make a good relationship stronger."

When asked if there was anything they would like people to know about foster parenting, they responded with: "While cliché, the saying 'it takes a village to raise a child' is a truth in foster parenting. Approaching parenting in an insulated manner – as if it is our job alone to raise our kids would be limiting at best, and dangerous at worst. There are hundreds of people and organizations who make up the community of support needed for the foster parenting process to be successful. One important part of our role is recognizing the value of community and knitting together all of those influences to complement what we can do in the home."

Thank you Laura and Rich for sharing your experience with us and for opening your hearts and home to our children—it does take a village!
